I would just ask a trusted professor where to go with such issues.
counseling, finding someone the person feels safe confided in, make sure the person is living in a safe situation, have an understanding that the institution will look at it seriously even if it involves a faculty or staff member of the institution.
I am studying for an MA degree online so this isn't really relevant ☐ state law and law enforcement
I attend classes online, so many of these are not relevant. If something were to happen, I would reach out to trusting faculty and/or connect with Title IX.
seek assistance through campus counseling department faculty
Professors and Peers
I would reach out to a professor or advisor that I trust
Probably a hotline.
discuss with the student advisor
my therapist, my friends
Disclaimer-I am taking online courses
N/A
student handbook
I'm not sure for all of the above but I feel confident I could find the answers
There are individual professors I would trust with this information, but I do not know who would handle it institutionally.
Therapist/counselor
I'm unsure. I attend an online masters program so I am unfamiliar with resources on campus.
This is skewed. I understand exactly what is "supposed" to happen when a student reports should be the question with a follow up of IN YOUR experience do you believe that Antioch knows what should happen when a student reports a claim of sexual misconduct at Antioch.
web search
I've heard through the grapevine that sexual misconduct occurred at Antioch and was handled questionably. I think the school should have been transparent with students instead of hiding what happened which only serves to make people imagine the worst.
My private therapist, support groups
N/A
Depending on the person's location I would refer them to local rape crisis services in their area, or to a professional who is TREM trained, or to RAINN. (I was a local rcc counselor for 10 years)
I would go to psych services I suppose. But I also would see my own therapist.
Faculty, family, friends
Support group
I'm not sure who to contact or what is available
Personal therapy, support hotlines, friends
domestic violence advocacy agency; parents; lawyer; hospital or doctor's office; perhaps police department
Information on where to report.
RAINN and NSVRC.org
This would vary depending on the comfort and wishes of the person to whom the incident occurred.
I would most likely have to ask a trusted professor where to get help on campus or who to reach out to.
I haven't attended any classes on campus- no idea how or where to go for support.
I would likely begin with the Antioch contacts I have, my advisor and the program administrator. I feel confident they would direct me. I would also use my own resources, therapist etc.
A student health center would be incredibly helpful.
My advisor
The free counseling program
Personal network of sensitive friends and colleagues.

Anonymous forms is the only way I feel safe. I (and others) have experienced backlash from professors who just... don't like us very much even if no one did anything wrong. So, in what world could I feel safe reporting something when it's THEM doing something wrong? That's like jumping in a tiger cage and asking it nicely not to eat you. I told a friend about it since this friend also knew the person who made the comments. I want to make it clear that I never reported the student who made these offensive comments because I didn't feel that they were personally harassing me but rather just misogynistic/sexist in general.
